Hongkong, October 25th, 1898. THE course taken by the Fire Commission at Shanghai in refraining from sending the Fire Brigade to render assistance on the occasion of the burning of the Shanghai Cutton Cloth Mills has provoked considerable discussion in the Model Settlement, To stand by and see a neighbour's house burning without raising a fluger to help, even if the parties were not ordinarily on friendly terms, would be considered as denoting a churlish nature, and it may be urged that the same principles that govern individuals in such matters should also govern communities. And yet we think chaser had no cash with him, but the ordinary the Shanghai Fire Commission followed a sound policy on this occasion. The Brigade is a voluntary one raised only for service within the Settlement. To atiend all the fires outside the Settle. ment would be more than the members of the Brigade would be ready to undertake or could possibly do, and it is only right and proper that the Chinese should be required to make their own arrangements for fire exfinction outside the limits of foreign jurisdiction. If a fire assumes dimensions with which they are unable to cope and they make a formal request for the assistance of the foreign Fire Brigade, such a request would no doubt always receive courteous consideration and be complied with as far as possible, just as in England one town will send its engines to assist in the exa neighbouring on application r such assistance being made. But in this case there was no such request unde and the Fire Commission had no assurance that the assistance of the Brigade would have been welcomed. The site for the cotton mill was purposely selected outside the Settlement in order to avoid payment of municipal taxes and to secure freedom from municipal regulations, and i must be supposed the proprietors made their selection with their eyes open to all the conrequires. The Fire Brigade is maintained out of the municipal rates and persons who go outside Settlement limits in order to escape contribution to those rates can hardly expect to enjoy the advantages of the expenditure of municipal funds. Combatting an argument said to weigh most with some people, namely, that drawn from the hostile attitude of Li Hung-chang towards foreign enterprise, the N. C. The fact that the Mrs. Phillips's eldest child, barely three years House of Commons had passed the Home Rale of age, had two fingers out off during the attack Bill was the most important advance that had been achieved by Home Rule. It was edious to think of the new-langled doctrine that the House of Lords had the right to force a dissolution. The admassion of such a doctrine would amount to high treason against the great nation of Great Britain, and would involve the question of the title being applied to the House of Pears of the "Self-governing Lords." The House of Lords was apparently unaware that by its action it was raising the questions its own independence and irresponsible body of Mrs. De Jong (nee Just) proves to be existence. In the event of a dissolution Home Rule would not be the only question abmitted to the electors, and unless the Lords earned wisdom, it was likely, that they would bitterly lament having raised the issue they had raised. He was unable at present submit a out-and-dried solution of the difficulty that had arisen, but next session the Home Rule Bill would be submitted to Parliament in a revised form, and the Government would find means of enforcing the will of the majority without resorting to any illegal act or doing violence to the Constitution.
